Introduction

4foodies is a food blog that offers delicious recipes (appetizers, entrees, and dessert). On the website recipes and photos are posted, along with step by step instructions. The 4foodies mission is to teach and inspire people of all skill levels to become confident chefs in their own home.

The website features an alert bar, masonry gallery, recipe cards, an events page where visitors can sign up and pay for cooking classes, and is optimized for mobile/tablet devices.

Design and Implementation

The goal in mind for the website was to create a simple black and white minimalist theme, so that users are drawn to the colorful food photography. We drafted wireframes for each page so that we could envision the layout of each page before coding. We worked on the header, footer, and navbar first before doing anything else since these three components form a template for every site page. After that, it was a simple matter of utilizing Bootstrap to create grids, cards, and forms with placeholder text and images. Once the page layout looked like the wireframe, we could update the text with real descriptions and images.

One feature is an unordered list with checkboxes for the recipes instructions page. Instead of using bullet points, the checkboxes allow users to keep track of ingredients they have/don't have by checking them off on their mobile device. Another interesting feature is the masonry gallery on the home page which presents all of the site's features in a fun, non-uniform grid that draws the user's eye around the page. The gallery includes not only recipe photos, but inspirational quotes, blog entries, and links to our other pages.

We also had plans to include a carousel of icons which represented various recipe categories. Unfortunately due to time constraints we were not able to implement this. The “recipe-template” also still needs work to make the page responsive (i.e. remove Bootstrap card and convert to grid). Additionally, the buttons in the alert bar and events page should open a modal that allows visitors to sign up and pay for events.

Conclusion

The biggest learning experience was collaborating on the project on Github to track our progress. We learned how to utilize branches to work on new features, give each other comments/feedback in code files, create Github issues, and work with pull requests.

Coming up with a gameplan by creating wireframes first and dividing tasks equally amongst each other helped to not only speed up the development process but more importantly allowed us to communicate effectively on our goals.

Another shortcoming we overcame was creating various recipe cards. Instead of getting too involved in the details and functionality of the site, we chose to focus on the design/layout first and made sure our links were all working. Eventually we would like to add modal components and make the contact form functional.
